The question of whether androids dream of electric sheep is the title and central theme of the science fiction novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? by Philip K. Dick.

The book explores a world where androids are indistinguishable from humans except for a lack of empathy. The story follows Rick Deckard, a bounty hunter who tracks down rogue androids.

The title refers to the empathy test used to distinguish between humans and androids. The test involves administering a fictional scenario and evaluating the subject's emotional response. Electric sheep are rare, real animals that people own as status symbols. Owning one is seen as a sign of empathy and a connection to the natural world. The book never definitively answers the question of whether androids dream or not. It explores the nature of reality, consciousness, and what it means to be human.

The book inspired the movie Blade Runner, though there are some key differences in plot.
